ABSTRACT

A golf ball has a plurality of linearly or curvilinearly extending ridge-like lands on its spherical surface. The percent occupation of the total of land areas relative to the overall area of a phantom spherical surface assumed at the level of the top of lands can be reduced to substantially zero.